Milt Mouse found a very good book on the art of Black Magic, and in short order he was able to do a lot of clever tricks. Just two miles down the road Farmer Al was out driving in his one dog power sulky. The dog spies some rabbits and a chase is on. The rabbits go through some queer places. Al nearly breaks his wisdom tooth, so he decides to give up the chase. As he was returning home, a tricky cat tries to fool him with the old pocket book "gag". Al falls for it but, finds the pocket book empty.

This same clever cat finds Milt Mouse reading his book nearby and decides to try the stunt on him. Milt takes one look then consults page 64 in the book that does the trick. He finds a big roll of bills in the purse. This makes the cat sore and a chase follows. Milt succeeds in disguising himself first as a water bucket then as a flower and other things. Milt at last makes a big mistake he tries to hide in Al's saxophone. Al gets out all the cats and dogs in the neighborhood. At 5:55 yesterday they were hot on his trail going southward. It looked like a bad night for Milt. Aesop's last words were: "You Can't Trust A Mouse".
